

About the Author

A keen genealogist, Faye Logue was born at Red Cliffs, Victoria, Australia in 1940 and has always held a great affection for Ireland and particularly the area surrounding Strabane as both her father, Samuel Alexander Donaghy, and husband, Ronnie Logue, were both born and raised within a few miles of the town. Following their marriage in 1962, the Logues moved to North Queensland, eventually settling near Tully where they were partners in a successful banana plantation for twenty-three years prior to its sale in 1999.

Commencing genealogical research in the 1980s, following her first visit to Ireland, it was soon evident that few Tyrone records were available for research in Australia necessitating the purchasing of microfilms of relevant records, including the Strabane Morning Post.

It soon became apparent that the files of the newspaper contained significant genealogical information that deserved transcribing, and so this book came into being.
